O, shades of departed chivalry and purity!

Alas for frail humanity!
The distinguished ex-President of the Southern Confederacy and President of a Southern Life Insurance Company, was occupying the berth with the married lady under his chivalric protection!

"Mr. Davis, you cannot be permitted to do this, sir; you must take another berth, sir; and Mr. Hess.

"It's none of your business, sir. I decline to leave. I have paid for these berths, and will occupy which one I choose," said the bold and distinguished ex-President, with that dignity and firmness so truly characteristic of the truly great man.

Mr. Hess protested, entreated, argued and begged, but the soul of Jefferson was unmoved. He wouldn't budge a foot.

The lady discreetly turned her face away, and took no part in the discussion.

Next is, he poked bay rum into the cut place with is, his towel, then choked the wound with powdered starce, then soaked it with bay rum again, and would have gone on soaking and powdering it for evermore, no doubt, if I had not rebelled and begget off. He powdered my whole face now, straightened me up and began to plough my hair thoughtfully with his hands and examine his lingers critically. Then he suggested a shampoo, and said my thair needed it hadly very badly. I observed that I had shampooed it myself very thoroughly in the bath yesterday. I "had him" again. He next recommended some of f "Smith's Hair Gloriller," and offered to tell me a bottle. I declined. He praised the new pertune, "Jones's Delight of the Toilet," and proposed to sell me some of that. I declined again. He tendered me as a tooth-wash atroeity of his own invention, and when I declined, offered to trade knives with me. He returned to business after his miscarriage of this last enterprise, sprinkled me all over legs and all over legs a By Mark Twain. O'All things change except barbers, the ways of barbers, and the surroundings of barbers. These never change. What one experiences in a barber shop the first time he cuters one, is what he always ex-periences in barber shops afterward till the end of his days. I got shaved this the end of his days. I got shaved this morning as usual. A man approached the door from Jones street as I approached it from Main—a thing that always happens. I hurried up, it was of no use; he entered the door one little atop shead of me, and I followed in on his heels and saw him take the only vacant chair, the ona presided over by the best barber. It always happens so. I sat down, hoping that I might fall heir to the chair belonging to the better of the remaining two barbers, for he had already begun combing his man a hair, while his courade was not yet quite done rubbing up and oiling his customer's locks. I watched the probabilities with strong interest. When after his miscarriage of this last enter-prise, sprinkled me all over, legs and all, greased my hair in defiance of my protests against it, rubbed and scrubbed a good deal of it out by the roots, and combed and brushed the rest, parting it behind and plastering, the eternal inverted arch to hair down on my forehead and them. of hair down on my forehead, and then, while combing my scant cycbrows and defiling them with pomade, strung out an account of the achievements of a six-ounce black and tan terrier of his till I heard the whistles blow for noon, and leave I was five mixture to a late for the his customer's locks. probabilities with strong probabilities with strong interest. When I saw that No. 2 was gaining on No. 1, my interest grow to solicitude. When No. 1 slopped a moment to make change on a bath ticket for a new-comer, and lost ground in the race, my solicitude rose to anxiety. When No. 1 caught up again, and both he and his comrades were pulling the towels away and brushing the powder from their customers' cheeks, and it was about an even thing which one would say "Next!" first, my very breath stood still with the suspense. But when, at the final culminating moment, No. 1 stopped to pass a comb a couple of times knew I was five minutes too late for the train. train. Then he snatched away the towel, brushed it lightly about my face, passed his comb through my eyebrows once more, and gayly sang out "Next!"
